An Ideal Newspaper

must be an ideal news-gatherer. ♪ ♪ ♪

AN evening paper to fulfill its mission should offer the history of the day in a concise, readable form, and to win the confidence of its readers the statements contained in its columns must be reliable.

The Evening Post, as far as men of wide experience, ability and judgment can make it, is an ideal newspaper. It commands the best sources of intelligence concerning matters of local, domestic and foreign interest; its special cable furnishes the latest financial news and market reports; it covers the whole field, and is an authority that may be quoted under any circumstances with perfect safety.

By the editorial page shall ye know a metropolitan daily, for by it the character of the publication is determined. It is refreshing to read a paper that adheres consistently to an independent policy; a paper that speaks its mind fearlessly, and where the opinions expressed are tempered by sound judgment. The Post's editorials are liberal, its restrictions just. It stands for the best politics, the best government—the best in everything. Its editorials strike the keynote for all the critical departments, wherein the same characteristics are to be observed.

The incisive and scholarly book reviews have made the Literary Department a potent influence felt throughout the East as well as in the West. An endorsement by The Post carries weight; its critiques are quoted the length and breadth of this country.

The sister arts, the fine arts, music and the drama, fare no less fortunately at the hands of competent critiques; the society column is marked by dignity and good taste, while the woman's page mirrors the movements of the women in public life as well as in the home.

A summary contained in the Saturday's issue briefly recalls the "Events of the Week," and an attractive feature is the daily column of "Lights and Shadows," presided over by R. M. F., who with good-natured raillery "Shoots folly as it flies." Once a week the Common Person distills the wisdom from everyday happenings; correspondents from the world's greatest centers keep the public in touch with national and international life—to sum it all up, The Post is everything a thoroughly first-class, wide-awake, ably conducted organ should be.
